

How a Highway is Built

Traffic counts give information . . . for traffic flow maps . . . and highway engineers pick possible routes.

Alternate routes are studied . . . designers draw profile and construction features . . . Department engineers submit plan to U. S. Bureau of Public Roads.

After hearing and final approval, agents of the Highway Department buy land for right of way . . . construction work follows . . . and finally, a beautiful new highway is ready for use.